this note, lately published for the first time:

KENSINGTON, W., Angust 19.

DEAR NED: Yes: I will try all I can, be sure.

But how on earth came you to get into so terrible a scrape! (Is that the right term!) Of course I will aid you—if I can, Johnson was here vesterday.

He spoke most highly of you. He is really a good fellow. As I previously said, I will do all I can;
but pray write again (I am very busy), or see me,
and let me know all. Ever yours sincerely,

w. M. T.

A superb edition of Sterne's " Sentimental Journey" is announced for immediate publication by J. W. Bonton. It is to be illustrated by some magnifi cent plates and cuts, drawn expressly for this edition by the distinguished artist, Maurice Leloir. Besides the 200 and more engravings on wood scattered through the text, there will be a portrait of Sterne and twelve full-page plates. The edition of 900 copies will be carefully printed in Paris and the type distributed. An edition de Grande luxe will consist of 100 numbered copies, each of which will have on the false title an original drawing by M. Leloir. These editions promise to be in every respect notable and beautiful specimens of the bookmakers' art.

An American doctor who is young and wealthy falls in love with Lady Barberina, the daughter of Mr. Andrew Lang is writing a formidable work en folk-lere and savage mythology; and he will, pending its publication, bring out a small volume containing the articles on those subjects which he has contributed to various periodicals.

Mr. Wilkie Collins declares that he considers the proposal to translate his novels into the Bengali language as conferring on him one of the highest distinctions of his literary life.

The late Charles Stewart Calverley, the author of "Fly Leaves," was an accomplished scholar; and he left at Oxford, it is said, an extraordinary and durable reputation as a wit. The good things of "Blades," as he was then called, are still retailed to the Balliol freshmen. An accident on the ice crippled Mr. Calverley's powers much in the later years might have done, without aiming at anything very ambitions.

Walter Besant's interesting suggestion for making people good by making them happy-a suggestion abodied and illustrated in his novel "All Sorts and Conditions of Men "-is to be treated in a more practical way in an article he has prepared for The Contemporary. In this article, "The Amusements of the People," he considers the proposal for a People's Palace at the East End of London.

Mr. Robert Louis Stevenson has been exceedingly ill at Nice; and he will probably not go back to work for some time. Meanwhile his "Treasure Island" is being heartily praised.

The distinguished preacher Père Didon is about to publish a book on the Germans, which is said to be remarkable for its generous impartiality. He warmly praises the patriotism displayed by the Germans: "Kings and Emperor, Chancellor and Ministers, soldiers and literary men, students and workmen, only dream of laboring for their country. They have but one watchword-the Fatherland before everything! Their patriotism is beyond dispute." He adds: "I shall never forget my indignation and anguish while reading the French news papers in Germany. I often found in the columns of a certain Parisian journal more insults against my country than in all the voluminous gazettes of | hereafter be sold by them. Berlin together."

Mr. Kinglake, as literary executor, has already taken in hand the note-books left by Mr. Abraham Hayward.

Heine's introduction to his Memoirs gives a humorous description of the different careers for which he was destined by his fond, ambitious mother. When at school Heinrich Heine stoutly refused to write French verses, much to the disgust of his French his apparent antipathy to poetry, for "she had the not treated it in a more appropriate fashion. The greatest dread of my becoming a poet; that would arry and rather frisky manner of the rondeau is not fitted to render properly a semi-tragical subbe the worst, she used to say, that could happen to ject—a thing that some modern versifiers need to pleted within the pages of these two volumes. Her plans for her intelligent son were far higher. The daughter of a manufacturer of the neighborhood having married a duke who had won many battles and been rapidly promoted, Heine was to win his golden epaulets and serve at the Emperor's Court. To this end he had to study Euclid, hydrostatics, algebra, and whatever it was deemed necessary to know for the administration of conquered provinces. But the Empire fell, and with it Mme. Heine's card castle. The house of Rothschild was at that time coming into power, and several other great firms had risen in the financial world. Therefore it was determined that Heine was to become a shining star in the realms of finance, and accordingly he studied modern languages, especially English, geography, book keeping, etc., and afterward entered the house of a well-known merchant. But the merchant soon shook his head over the uncouth apprentice, de-claring that he had no "talent," which the boy laughingly admitted was not quite untrue. Before long some great firms failed. Heine's father lost his fortune, and the mercantile soap-bubble burst even more rapidly than its imperial predecessor. The next career which Mme, Heine thought would lead to glory was that of a lawyer. Were not barristers in possession of the highest posts in the administration? Was there not a new University of Bonn, where celebrated professors drilled wisdom into the heads of multitudes of students? To Bonn therefore, the dutiful son made his way, and after three years of study Heine wearily sighed, "What a frightful book the Corpus Juris is !- it is the Hible of egotism." There was no success to be artained there, this was evident, and the mother, now an elderly dame, regretted that her son had not taken the Church for his profession. By this time, however, the boy had become a man, and insisted upon taking his own course.

A fair and benevolent Bostonian who is fond of children has lately been reading at stated times to a group of youngsters Miss Alcott's amusing "Little Women." The book so interested the children that when the last chapters were reached the lady invited Miss Alcott; with whom she was well acquainted, to lunch at her house and meet the little ones. The invitation was accepted, but the children viewed the talented lady with considerable awe, none of them seeming to de sire an intimate acquaintance. During the lunch the hostess had occasion to leave the room, and what was her astonishment to find all the children trooping after her, leaving Miss Alcott alone. "Why, what does this mean?" asked the lady.
"Why have you come out here?" "Cause," said one of the smallest of the group," we ain't a-goin stay in there with that women, We're afraid of her." Miss Alcott's fondness for children and the tact she possesses for pleasing them is well-known and the lady was consequently at a loss to account for the singular conduct of her little proteges.

Putnam's Sons have issued a second edition.

"The most potent and lasting influence in the civilization of generations is literature," said Mr. Charles Dudley Warner the other day in his lecture on the relation of literature to life. "Under this name all books must not be included, but it is euduring and universal thought. It requires not only fact, but the record of feeling and emotion. These are of most value in the lives of men, whether they are aware of it or not. They answer to a want of the human soul higher than for mere facts, or for wealth and pleasure. A strong contrast is drawn between the man of trade and the devotee of letters. The life of different interests is bounded by narrow horizons. The seeker of material good has a strong natural contempt for him who pursues literature. Yet if these are diverced they are ruined. The production of poetry is necessary to the well-being of mankind. Yet a poet is regarded generally as a sort of inspired idiot. If a man is known only as a poet he suffers in our respect, and it is only after he has passed away, when only his work remains to save his name from oblivion, that we call him great. This popular estimate extends to all producers of literature. Yet poetry has been the universal solace of all people who have been lifted from barbarism."

The late venerable Arnold Guyot, shortly before his death, prepared for publication in a compact shape his popular exposition on the Biblical cosmogony as seen in the light of modern science. This has just been published, with illustrations, by Charles Scribner's Sons.

There is an interesting drawing of Tennyson in the current number of Harper's Weekly. The poet is represented as seated in his Aldworth library with his cherished books about him.

The same number of the Weekly contains a portrait of Captain Mary Miller. Mrs. Miller's is a gentle and clever face, thoroughly womanly in expression.

The Revised Version of the Old Testament is likely to be out in less than six months. The St. James's Gazette hopes that it may be minus the marginal notes. "Indispensable as these are," it says, 'from the scholar's point of view, to the general reader they present the serious drawback of constant interruptions. Many persons, indeed, may have been reminded by them of Macaulay's critieism on a famous edition of Boswell's 'Life of a hundred earls. What happens thereafter is told Johnson': 'Mr. Croker is perpetually stopping us by Mr. Henry James in the story which will appear in our progress through the most delightful narin the May Century. The scene is laid party in Lon-don and party in New-York. stance, occur in the parable of the Prodigal Son. one for the sake of informing us that the 'husks eaten by the swine were the pods of the carob tree, and another to remind us that 'servants' might also be translated 'bond-servants.' Doubtless it should not be forgotten that the conditions of domestic service in ancient Palestine were dissimilar from those which obtain in modern England; but it is surely a little trying to be reminded of the fact at east twenty-six times in the Gospel of St. Luke alone. It may be answered that no one is obliged to refer to the notes; but the truth is that the eye involuntarily turns aside, on being, as one may say, requested to do so. Comte's is not exactly a name of authority in a question of this sort; but the founder of the sect of Positivists knew what he was about when he enjoined his followers to read of his life, and he only showed the world what he the masterpieces of human eloquence in editions without notes. It is impossible to enjoy any book with a man pulling your sleeve every ten secon ask you if you are quite sure you understand it."

The original editions of Keats's three volumes, which once lay like a drug upon the market, have, it is said, increased in value until there is perhaps | $150; extra gilt, with gilt edges, $2 no modern English poetry, except some of Shelley's, which is so hopelessly out of the reach of a collector with a slender purse. Mr. Forman intends to follow his bulky and costly annotated edition with one consisting of the text alone, without notes.

Mr. Forman has printed among other recovered bits of Keats's verse a song beginning " Hence Burgundy, Claret and Port," and containing this characteristic passage:

Instead of a pitiful rummer
My wine overlarins a whole summer;
My bowl is the sky,
And I drink at my eye,
Till I feel in the brain Then follow, my Cains, then follow; Over the green of the hill We will drink our fill Of golden sunshine, Till our brains intertwine With the glory and grace of Apollo.

The plates of "Harper's Pictorial History of the Great Rebellion" have been purchased by McDonnell Brothers of Chicago, and the volum swill

"Clarissa Harlowe," we are told, has even now a public of its own in England. It is no longer the upper and middle classes who weep over the book; it is the cottagers who regard it as classic, and no country book-hawker's wallet is without a copy of Richardson's masterpiece. "Pamela." too, is almost as popular in the English villages.

Mr. John Moran's poem, "At the Confessional," published in this week's Life, has so good a motive, albeit a not entirely freshone, that it is a pity he has remember.

The March number of The Book-Buyer is full of entertainment and information. The little periodical is making the pleasantest of reappearances in its character of old friend.
